Helen Holden Slottje, Esq., Slottje Law, and the 2014 Goldman Environmental Prize Winner for North America. Helen was awarded the Goldman Environmental Prize for her pioneering legal work that successfully defended New York communities from environmentally destructive fracking (high-impact industrialized extraction of natural gas from solid rock). In the face of a state statute that prohibited local regulation of the oil and gas industry, and a state-wide regulatory agency with the mission of promoting the oil and gas industry, Helen was undaunted. She developed an innovative strategy that employed constitutionally protected local land use planning powers to prohibit fracking. With the help of her husband David, Helen worked tirelessly to ensure that communities could refuse to host fossil fuel extraction through enacting local laws. With the Slottjes' help, over 150 communities across the state organized and passed local measures to stop fracking. These local laws faced heavy opposition and ultimately litigation from powerful entrenched interests that sought to have the laws declared unenforceable. In a major victory for the people, the New York courts upheld these local fracking bans. Ultimately this community-based resistance led to an unprecedented state-wide ban on fracking, a true David and Goliath victory. Helen continues to bring her unique insights and legal advice to purpose driven businesses that seek to incorporate sustainable development goals into their culture. Helen is an Honorary Advisor of the NGOCS-D-NY.
